

IN THE INTER-AMERICAN COMMISSION OF HUMAN RIGHTS

Case No. 12.108

Marcel Claude Reyes and Others

v.

Chile

WRITTEN COMMENTS OF:

OPEN SOCIETY JUSTICE INITIATIVE
ARTICLE 19, GLOBAL CAMPAIGN FOR FREE EXPRESSION
LIBERTAD DE INFORMACIÓN MEXICO
INSTITUTO PRENSA Y SOCIEDAD

I. Introduction

1. The signatory organizations respectfully submit this amicus curiae brief for the benefit of the Commission's consideration of the salient issues raised by the above-referenced case.
2. The Justice Initiative pursues law reform activities grounded in the protection of human rights, and contributes to the development of legal capacity for open societies. It has offices in New York (United States), Budapest (Hungary) and Abuja (Nigeria). Among its activities, the Justice Initiative prepares legal submissions for national and international courts and tribunals on questions of law where its expertise may be of assistance. In the area of access to information, the Justice Initiative has extensive experience in promoting the adoption and implementation of freedom of information laws in Eastern Europe, Latin America and elsewhere. It has also contributed to international standard-setting and monitoring of government transparency around the world. As an organization that promotes the highest international standards of freedom of expression and information, the Justice Initiative has a particular interest in the questions raised by this case.
3. ARTICLE 19, Global Campaign for Free Expression, is an international human rights NGO, based in London but with offices in different regions of the world, including in Mexico City. Taking its name from Article 19 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, ARTICLE 19 works globally to protect and promote the right to freedom of expression, including access to information and the means of communication. ARTICLE 19 is well known for its authoritative work in elaborating the implications of the guarantee of freedom of expression in different thematic areas. It has particular expertise in the area of access to information. In June 1999, ARTICLE 19 published

The Public's Right to Know: Principles on Freedom of Information Legislation,<sup>1</sup> a set of principles on international standards and best comparative practice relating to access to information legislation. In July 2001, it published A Model Freedom of Information Law,<sup>2</sup> which translates the Principles into legislative form.

4. Libertad de Información Mexico, Asociación Civil (LIMAC) promotes and defends the right of access to public information at federal and local levels in Mexico, including through strategic litigation. LIMAC is also a leading promoter of government transparency efforts in Latin America. In particular, it has provided assistance for the adoption and implementation of freedom of information laws in several countries of the region (Argentina, Chile, Ecuador, Nicaragua, Paraguay and Peru). As an organization committed to the promotion of the right to information at the international level, LIMAC takes a strong interest in the issues presented by this case.
5. Instituto Prensa y Sociedad of Peru (Press and Society Institute, IPYS) defends and promotes freedom of the press, and freedom of expression and information in Peru and Latin America. IPYS pursues these goals through a range of activities, including litigation at the local and international levels. In addition, IPYS works to enhance government transparency and civil empowerment in the region. Since 1999, IPYS has engaged in systematic monitoring of freedom of expression and information throughout the continent, through its network of correspondents in Argentina, Bolivia, Brazil, Chile, Colombia, Ecuador, El Salvador, Guatemala, Mexico, Paraguay, Uruguay and Venezuela.
6. The present case before this Commission raises issues of great significance for the development of freedom of information law in the Americas and beyond. Both this Commission and the Inter-American Court of Human Rights have underscored the importance of the free exchange of information and ideas for the healthy development and safeguarding of democracy. However, the Commission and the Court have not had thus far an opportunity to fully consider the question of whether the American Convention of Human Rights (“the Convention”) guarantees a right of general access to state-held information.
7. That is the central issue addressed by this brief, which draws on relevant international and comparative law and practice from the Americas and other leading jurisdictions. It is on the basis of these standards that we consider the scope of the right to information, and the principles that underlie its protection under the Convention and international human rights law. The brief then discusses whether Chile has complied with its Convention obligations to guarantee freedom of information, both generally and with respect to the specific case at issue.

---

<sup>1</sup> (London: ARTICLE 19, 1999). Available at: <http://www.article19.org/docimages/512.htm>.

<sup>2</sup> (London: ARTICLE 19, 2001). Available at: <http://www.article19.org/docimages/1112.htm>.

II. Discussion

A. Summary of Facts

8. The present case involves the denial by the Chilean authorities of a request for information by three Chilean citizens, Marcel Claude Reyes, Sebastian Cox Urrejola and Arturo Longton Guerrero (“victims”). Mr. Claude Reyes is an environmental academic and activist, who was at the time executive director of the Terram Foundation, a registered environmental group based in Santiago. Mr. Cox Urrejola is a human rights lawyer and executive director of FORJA, a civil society organization that promotes access to justice. Mr. Longton Guerrero was at the time a Member of the Chilean Parliament.
9. The information at the center of this case was requested by the Terram Foundation on May 6, 1998, by means of a letter to the Chilean Foreign Investment Committee (“Committee”), an agency of the Chilean Executive. The Foundation’s request referred to information in the possession of the Committee related to its approval of a major logging project, known as the Condor River project, to be carried out by a subsidiary of the US-based forestry company then called Trillium Corporation (the company has since changed its name to Savia International).
10. In the early 1990s, Trillium bought some 285,000 hectares of native timber land, known as lenga, in the Chilean part of Tierra del Fuego. Shortly afterwards, Trillium proposed the Condor River project to the Chilean authorities, conducted an initial environmental impact assessment in 1995, and started harvesting the lenga in 1996. From the very beginning, however, the project met with strong opposition from Chilean and international environmental groups, which raised concerns about the project’s impact on the area’s fragile ecosystems and what they saw as Trillium’s poor record of sustainable logging in the United States and elsewhere. As a result, the Condor River project was halted several times between 1996 and early 1998, including once as a result of a Supreme Court order.
11. It was under this state of affairs that the Terram Foundation filed a request for information collected by the Committee, which had vetted and approved Trillium’s preliminary foreign investment application, pursuant to Chilean law. The Committee’s information-gathering responsibilities under the law can be summarized as follows:
  - a. collect and process the results of inspections carried out by other agencies regarding the applicant company’s compliance with its obligations under foreign investment laws;
  - b. interact with other agencies that are required to provide information to the Committee or whose prior authorization is required before the Committee can authorize a foreign investment project;
  - c. investigate both within and outside Chile the suitability and seriousness of the applicants; and
  - d. solicit from other entities in the public and private sector any information and documentation that the Committee deems necessary for carrying out its functions.

12. Given the Committee's powers, on May 6, 1998, the Terram Foundation requested access to several categories of documents and information that the Committee ought to possess in relation to the Condor River project. On May 19, 1998, Terram representatives met with the Vice President of the Committee, who agreed to provide information only on the amount of Trillium's total investment, which was later provided to Terram by fax. Following the Committee's failure to respond to the remaining requests, on June 3 and July 2, 1998, Terram sent two follow-up letters, which also went unanswered. The Committee reacted through a press statement, without providing any information, only after Mr. Claude Reyes and Mr. Longton Guerrero complained publicly about its non-responsiveness.
13. It is undisputed by the parties that the Committee provided no information (nor, according to the petitioners, any reasons for its refusal to do so) with respect to Terram's requests for the following data:
  - a. any information collected by the Committee on Trillium's track record, in order to satisfy itself of the company's past seriousness and legitimacy; as well as its formal decision on Trillium's application;
  - b. any information in the possession of the Committee regarding Trillium's compliance with its obligations under Chilean foreign investment laws, including as to any past violations; and
  - c. any information collected from third parties in relation to the above.
14. As a result, the victims filed three successive constitutional appeals against the Committee's effective denial of their request in the domestic courts, claiming a violation of their right to information under the Chilean Constitution and the Convention. All appeals were summarily dismissed as "manifestly ill-founded," including by the Chilean Supreme Court on July 31, 1998.
15. On December 17, 1998, a group of nongovernmental organizations and Members of Parliament ("petitioners") filed a petition on behalf of the victims with this Commission. The Commission declared the petition admissible on October 10, 2003.<sup>3</sup>

B. Article 13 guarantees a right of access to state-held information

16. This Commission has recognized that "access to information held by the state is a fundamental right of every individual."<sup>4</sup> The existence of such a right draws support from both the language and jurisprudence of Article 13 of the Convention, which guarantees everyone's "freedom to seek, receive, and impart information and ideas of all kinds." The Inter-American Court acknowledged early on that the Article 13 rights of listeners and receivers of information and ideas are on the same footing as the rights of the speaker: "For the average citizen it is at least as important to know the opinion of others or to have access to information generally as is the very right to impart his own opinion.”<sup>5</sup>

---

<sup>3</sup> Report No. 60/03.

<sup>4</sup> Inter-American Declaration of Principles on Freedom of Expression, adopted at the Commission's 108th regular session, October 19, 2000, para. 4.

17. In a modern democracy, a very significant part of the totality of information held by “others” is in the hands of the state. That body of information is produced, collected and processed using public resources and it ultimately belongs to the public. The government holds the information as a custodian for the public, and is under a general obligation to make it available to the citizenry, save when a compelling public or private interest dictates otherwise. As such, the right to access government information is an integral part of the Article 13 right to freedom of expression—a right that includes, in the words of the Inter-American Court, “the collective right to receive any information whatsoever.”<sup>6</sup>
18. This Commission has already recognized certain aspects of states’ obligation to provide information in its jurisprudence, acknowledging, for example, that Article 13 guarantees the “right to truth” about responsibility for serious human rights violations, a right to which corresponds a positive state obligation:

the right to truth is founded in Articles 8 [right to a fair trial] and 25 [right to judicial protection] of the Convention, insofar as they are both “instrumental” in the judicial establishment of the facts and circumstances that surrounded the violation of a fundamental right. ... [T]his right has its roots in Article 13 (1) of the Convention, because that article recognizes the right to seek and receive information. With regard to that article, ... the State has the positive obligation to guarantee essential information to preserve the rights of the victims, to ensure transparency in public administration and the protection of human rights.<sup>7</sup>

19. The right to access state-held information is further strengthened by its close connection to another fundamental right, enshrined in Article 23 of the Convention: “the right to take part in the conduct of public affairs, directly or through freely chosen representatives.” In a democracy, citizens exercise their self-governance rights not only through free and periodic elections, but also through a myriad of other fora and means of influencing and interacting with those responsible for setting public policies. Both direct and indirect participation, during or outside election periods, would be greatly undermined by the lack of a general right of access to government information, and the resulting inability to follow and engage in government decision-

---

<sup>5</sup> Compulsory Membership in an Association Prescribed by Law for the Practice of Journalism, Advisory Opinion OC-5/85, November 13, 1985, para. 32. The Spanish version of this quote speaks of “informacion de que disponen otros,” literally “information available to others.”

<sup>6</sup> Id., para. 31.

<sup>7</sup> Barrios Altos Case (Chumbipuma Aguirre et al. v. Peru), Inter-American Court of Human Rights, Judgment of March 14, 2001, para. 45. The Court in this case considered it unnecessary to address the claims under Article 13, having held that Peru had violated Articles 8 and 25 of the Convention.

making. As the Inter-American Court has argued, “a society that is not well-informed is not a society that is truly free.”<sup>8</sup>

20. It is important to note here that Chile does not appear to dispute the petitioners’ claim that there exists a general right of access to government information under the Convention. This is clear, inter alia, from this Commission’s report on the admissibility of this petition, which describes the position of the State beginning as follows: “The State argues that the Vice-President of the Committee on Foreign Investment complied with his obligations under Article 13 by providing some of the information requested by petitioners.”<sup>9</sup>

Right to Information in State Practice

21. The recognition of a fundamental right of access to state-held information is well supported by the current status of the right in state practice and international law. More than fifty countries around the world have adopted freedom of information laws (statutes) that provide for general access to government information.<sup>10</sup> In the Americas, these include Belize, Canada, Colombia, the Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Jamaica, Mexico, Panama, Peru, Trinidad and Tobago, and the United States of America. Over forty countries worldwide, including Colombia, Guatemala, Peru and Venezuela, have incorporated the right of access to public information into their constitutional bills of rights, formally recognizing its essential role in the proper functioning of a democratic system.
22. At least seven countries in the Americas are currently considering proposals to enact national freedom of information laws.<sup>11</sup> In 1999, one year after the filing of this petition with the Commission, Chile itself passed a law granting general access to the administrative acts of the state administration and their supporting documents.<sup>12</sup> This indicates that a general right to government information is now the rule in the Americas, as in most of the rest of the democratic world. The general consensus of the Member States on this issue is most clearly revealed by the OAS General Assembly’s 2003 and 2004 resolutions on access to public information, both of which

---

<sup>8</sup> Compulsory Membership Opinion, para. 70.

<sup>9</sup> Admissibility Report, para. 38. We will address below the State’s claim that the denial of access to the remaining information was supposedly justified for various reasons.

<sup>10</sup> David Banisar, Freedom of Information and Access to Government Record Laws Around the World, May 2004, available at www.freedominfo.org.

<sup>11</sup> These are Argentina, Bolivia, Brazil, Guatemala, Nicaragua, Paraguay, and Uruguay. In some countries, such as Argentina and Mexico, provinces, municipalities and other sub-national entities have adopted acts that grant a general right of access to information in their possession. See “Report of the Office of the Special Rapporteur for Freedom of Expression,” in Annual Report of the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights (2003), OEA/Ser.L/V/II.118, Doc. 70 rev. 2.

<sup>12</sup> Id., para. 86. The law is known as Ley de Probidad Administrativa [Administrative Probity Act], no. 19.653.

recognize the states' obligation to "respect and promote respect for everyone's access to public information", which is deemed to be "a requisite for the very exercise of democracy."<sup>13</sup>

23. Even in the absence of explicit constitutional or statutory authorization, courts in several countries have upheld a fundamental right of access to information as a corollary of freedom of expression and participation rights. The Supreme Court of India addressed the issue in a case involving the government's refusal to release intra-agency correspondence regarding transfers and dismissals of judges. Recognizing a "right to know which seems implicit in the right of free speech and expression," the Indian Court argued that,

[w]here a society has chosen to accept democracy as its creedal faith, it is elementary that the citizens ought to know what their government is doing. The citizens have a right to decide by whom and by what rules they shall be governed and they are entitled to call on those who govern on their behalf to account for their conduct. No democratic government can survive without accountability and the basic postulate of accountability is that the people should have information about the functioning of government. ... The citizens' right to know the facts, the true facts, about the administration of the country is thus one of the pillars of a democratic State.<sup>14</sup>

24. The Constitutional Court of (South) Korea reached a similar conclusion in a 1989 case involving a municipal office's unjustified refusal to grant the applicant access to certain real estate records he had requested. The Korean Court argued that unhindered access to government information was essential to the "free formation of ideas," which is itself a pre-condition for the realization of genuine freedom of expression and communication.<sup>15</sup> This and subsequent freedom of information decisions of the Korean Court influenced the legislature to adopt in 1996 a comprehensive access to information law.<sup>16</sup>

25. This approach has also been embraced by national courts in the Americas. Thus, the Constitutional Chamber of the Supreme Court of Costa Rica held in a 2002 case that the Central Bank's refusal to disclose a report of the International Monetary Fund, requested by a newspaper, violated the constitutional right to information "to the detriment of all Costa Rican citizens." The Court reasoned that

---

<sup>13</sup> In addition, the resolutions provide for the states' obligation to "promote the adoption of any necessary legislative or other types of provisions to ensure [the right's] recognition and effective application." Resolution 1932 (XXXIII-O/03) on Access to Public Information: Strengthening Democracy, adopted on June 10, 2003; and Resolution 2057 (XXXIV-O/04) on Access to Public Information: Strengthening Democracy, adopted on June 8, 2004.

<sup>14</sup> S.P. Gupta v. Union of India [1982] AIR (SC) 149, at 232.

<sup>15</sup> Forests Survey Inspection Request Case, 1 KCCR 176 (September 4, 1989). A summary of the judgment is available at <http://www.ccourt.go.kr/english/decision.htm>.

<sup>16</sup> Disclosure of Information by Public Agencies Act (no. 5242), December 31, 1996.

the State must guarantee that information of a public character and importance is made known to the citizens, and, in order for this to be achieved, the State must encourage a climate of freedom of information. ... In this way, the State ... is the first to have an obligation to facilitate not only access to this information, but also its adequate disclosure and dissemination, and towards this aim, the State has the obligation to offer the necessary facilities and eliminate existing obstacles to its attainment.<sup>17</sup>

In reaching its decision, the Costa Rican Court relied emphatically on the symbiotic relationship between the right to information and the rights of democratic participation, arguing that “the right to information ... implicates the citizens’ participation in collective decision-making, which, to the extent that freedom of information is protected, guarantees the formation and existence of a free public opinion, which is the very pillar of a free and democratic society.”<sup>18</sup>

Right to Information in International Law and Practice

26. This Commission is not alone in recognizing the right of the public to receive generalized access to records and information in the hands of the state. So have the other two regional human rights mechanisms, confirming the global trend toward acceptance of the right as a basic individual and collective entitlement. In Europe, the main human rights organization of the continent, the Council of Europe, adopted its first recommendation on the right of access more than twenty years ago.<sup>19</sup> In 2002, the Committee of Ministers adopted a new recommendation providing for a general right to access official documents in the following terms:

Member states should guarantee the right of everyone to have access, on request, to official documents held by the public authorities. This principle should apply without discrimination on any ground, including national origin.<sup>20</sup>

27. In the 25-member European Union, the Union’s bill of rights grants a right of access to documents held by Union institutions to “[a]ny citizen of the Union, and any natural or legal person residing or having its registered office in a Member State.”<sup>21</sup>

---

<sup>17</sup> Navarro Gutiérrez v. Lizano Fait, Judgment of April 2, 2002, as translated in the 2003 Report of the Special Rapporteur for Freedom of Expression, 161.

<sup>18</sup> Id., para. VI.

<sup>19</sup> The 1981 recommendation provided that “[e]veryone within the jurisdiction of a member state shall have the right to obtain, on request, information held by the public authorities ....” Recommendation (81) 19 on Access to Information Held by Public Authorities, adopted by the Council of Ministers on November 25, 1981.

<sup>20</sup> Recommendation (2002)2 on Access to Official Documents, February 21, 2002, para. III (emphasis added).

<sup>21</sup> Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union, December 7, 2000, art. 42. The Charter is not legally binding but can be invoked by EU and national courts. Since the adoption of the Charter, EU institutions have debated the need to make the Charter binding, which led to a decision to include a binding bill of rights in the new draft Constitution of the Union.

The EU's new draft Constitution includes a similar right of access to Union documents, "in whatever form they are produced."<sup>22</sup> Considering that both the Charter and the draft Constitution are based on the constitutional traditions of the member states, the inclusion of the right of access to information therein suggests that this right has not only become ubiquitous, but is widely perceived as a fundamental right on the European continent.

28. These recent developments notwithstanding, the European Court of Human Rights has not construed thus far a general right of access out of Article 10 of the European Convention on Human Rights.<sup>23</sup> The Court has recognized, however, a right to state-held information under circumstances in which the denial of information affects the enjoyment of other Convention rights, such as the right to respect for private and family life, under Article 8 of the Convention. In Guerra v. Italy, a case brought by individuals living near a chemical factory in relation to the failure of the Italian authorities to inform them about the risks of potentially devastating accidents, the Court held that, under such circumstances, Article 8 imposed on states a positive obligation to inform. Failure to do so had left the applicants unable to assess the risks and make informed decisions about living near the hazardous facility.<sup>24</sup>

29. As noted, the European Court did not consider Article 10 to be applicable in these cases. In Guerra, the Court ruled, in language similar to that employed in the earlier cases, that

[the] freedom to receive information, referred to in paragraph 1 of Article 10 of the Convention, "basically prohibits a government from restricting a person from receiving information that others wish or may be willing to impart to him" .... That freedom cannot be construed as imposing on a State, in circumstances such as those of the present case, positive obligations to collect and disseminate information of its own motion.<sup>25</sup>

---

<sup>22</sup> Draft Treaty Establishing a Constitution for Europe, adopted by the European Convention on 13 June and 10 July 2003, arts. 49 and II-42.

<sup>23</sup> Article 10 provides, in the relevant part, that "[e]veryone has the right to freedom of expression. This right shall include freedom to hold opinions and to receive and impart information and ideas without interference by public authorities and regardless of frontiers."

<sup>24</sup> Guerra and Others v. Italy, Judgment of February 19, 1998. The Court found that similar positive obligations existed in Gaskin v. United Kingdom, Judgment of July 7, 1989 (involving refused access to case records to an adult who had been in the care of the local authorities as a child); and McGinley and Egan v. United Kingdom, Judgment of June 9, 1998 (involving refused access to records regarding the potential health hazards resulting from nuclear radiation tests to which the applicants had been exposed while serving in the British army).

<sup>25</sup> Guerra, para. 53 (references omitted, emphasis added). Three concurring opinions touched on this issue: Judge Palm, joined by five other judges, agreed that Article 10 was not applicable to this particular case, but in so doing "put strong emphasis on the factual situation at hand, not excluding that under different circumstances the State may have a positive obligation to make available information to the public and to disseminate such information which by its nature could not otherwise come to the knowledge of the public." Judge Jambrek considered that Article 10 creates a positive obligation for the State only "when a

Relying in part on the nuances of opinion within the Court, various commentators have argued that, by qualifying its holding with respect to the circumstances of each individual case, the Court has left the door open to interpretations of Article 10 that might recognize a right of access in other factual situations. The Venice Commission, the Council of Europe's authoritative advisory body on constitutional matters, reached the following conclusion in a 2000 opinion:

the case-law of the European Court of Human Rights has not yet given a clear answer as to whether Article 10 entails a general obligation for the authorities to disseminate information of their own motion. It would seem to imply, however, an obligation to provide information on request, subject, of course, to the limitations set forth in Article 10 para 2 of the Convention.<sup>26</sup>

The Venice Commission thus highlighted the distinction between an unqualified right to proactive dissemination of information by the State, in the absence of any request, and a right to information in response to a specific request by an individual or group. In the latter situation, which is analogous to the facts of the present case against Chile, Article 10 would give rise, in the opinion of the Venice Commission, to a right of access and a corresponding obligation for the state.

30. In assessing the relevance of the European Court's case law, we would respectfully bring to the attention of this Commission two important differences in the respective textual bases. First, Article 10 of the European Convention is cast in negative terms, guaranteeing the freedom to receive information and ideas "without interference by public authority"—in other words, a freedom of primarily horizontal exchanges among individuals and other private entities that should not be disturbed by the state. This conceptual approach chosen by the drafters may underlie, to some extent, the apparent ambiguity of the European Court in relation to the general right of access to official information.<sup>27</sup> person of his/her own will demands/requests information which is at the disposal of the government at the material time." Judge Thor Vilhjalmsson, in a partly dissenting opinion, was of the view that Article 10 should have been applied and expressed agreement with the European Commission, which argued in the same case that the provision of information to the public was now one of the essential means of protecting the well-being and health of the local population in situations in which the environment was at risk. Consequently, the words "This right shall include freedom ... to receive ... information..." in paragraph 1 of Article 10 had to be construed as conferring an actual right to receive information, in particular from the relevant authorities, on members of local populations who had been or might be affected by an industrial or other activity representing a threat to the environment. Id., para. 52.

---

<sup>26</sup> European Commission for Democracy Through Law, "Consolidated Opinion on Freedom of Expression and Freedom of Access to Information as Guaranteed in the Constitution of Bosnia and Herzegovina," CDL (2000) 78, October 2, 2000, para. 16. The Commission's analysis was in response to a question put by the Bosnian authorities as to whether the freedom of expression guarantees of the Dayton Peace Agreement—which incorporated by reference the European Convention on Human Rights—included a right of access to information.

<sup>27</sup> The European Court has recognized, however, that Article 10 may create positive obligations for the state in other contexts. For example, in Ozgur Gundem v. Turkey the Court held that Turkey's failure to take

31. That is not the case, however, with Article 13 of the American Convention, which guarantees the free exchange of information and ideas in general terms, without any reference to the intervention of the state.<sup>28</sup> Article 13 has been consistently interpreted by the Convention bodies as guaranteeing more than a purely negative freedom from government interference. This is evident in the Inter-American Court's embracing the notion of the collective right of the public to be informed and in this Commission's recognition of the right to truth (and the corresponding obligations of the state). A general right of access to state-held information is a logical component of the right of the citizenry to be informed, to be able to participate meaningfully in governance and to hold the government accountable.
32. In addition, both the text and the jurisprudence of Article 13 indicate that the state has certain positive obligations to act to secure freedom of expression and information. Thus, paragraph 3 of Article 13 provides that this freedom "may not be restricted by indirect methods or means", including the "abuse of ... private controls over newsprint, radio broadcasting frequencies or equipment used in the dissemination of information." In this context, the Inter-American Court has noted that

Article 13(3) does not only deal with indirect governmental restrictions, it also expressly prohibits "private controls" producing the same result. This provision must be read together with the language of Article 1 of the Convention wherein the States Parties "undertake to respect the rights and freedoms recognized (in the Convention) ... and to ensure to all persons subject to their jurisdiction the free and full exercise of those rights and freedoms ...." Hence, a violation of the Convention in this area can be the product not only of the fact that the State itself imposes restrictions of an indirect character which tend to impede "the communication and circulation of ideas and opinions," but the State also has an obligation to ensure that the violation does not result from the "private controls" referred to in paragraph 3 of Article 13.<sup>29</sup>

Such an obligation includes perforce a positive duty to act to eliminate any private barriers to free and pluralistic communication. The same fundamental interest in the free circulation of ideas and information requires the state to act to make available its own information to the citizenry.

33. Secondly, unlike Article 10 of the European Convention, Article 13 of the American Convention provides for the freedom to seek, as well as receive and impart, information and ideas of all kinds. Article 19 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and Article 19 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights also contain the word "seek" in their formulations. Unfortunately, the drafting history of Article 13 appears to shed little light on the original understanding of the freedom to steps to protect a newspaper from attacks perpetrated by private persons violated Article 10. Judgment of March 16, 2000, paras. 44-45.

---

<sup>28</sup> That is not to say, of course, that freedom of information is an absolute right; the present discussion relates to the nature of the right, not its contours.

<sup>29</sup> Compulsory Membership Opinion, para. 48.

seek information and ideas.<sup>30</sup> However, as the OAS Special Rapporteur has observed,<sup>31</sup> the practice of the States Parties, described above, in the decades following adoption of the Convention, and the progressive interpretation of Convention Articles 13 and 23 by this Commission and the Court would allow, and indeed logically require, recognition of a general right to seek information held by the state.

34. At the regional level, the right of access to government information has also been recognized by this Commission's African counterpart. The African Commission on Human and Peoples' Rights has not yet had an opportunity to decide, in its adjudication procedure, whether the Banjul Charter grants a right of access to official information. The Commission has nevertheless held, like its Inter-American counterparts, that Article 9 of the Charter protects not only the free speech rights of the speaker, but also the rights of those interested in receiving information and ideas. Thus, in a case against Gambia, the Commission held that the politically motivated harassment and intimidation of journalists not only deprived them "of their rights to freely express and disseminate their opinions, but also the public, of the right to information."<sup>32</sup>
35. More recently, the African Commission expressed its position, and its interpretation of Article 9, on the right to information in its Declaration of Principles on Freedom of Expression in Africa, which contains a comprehensive statement of the principles applicable in this area. Principle IV of the Declaration provides as follows:
1. Public bodies hold information not for themselves but as custodians of the public good and everyone has a right to access this information, subject only to clearly defined rules established by law.
  2. The right to information shall be guaranteed by law in accordance with the following principles: everyone has the right to access information held by public bodies; everyone has the right to access information held by private bodies which is necessary for the exercise or protection of any right ....<sup>33</sup>
36. The 53-member Commonwealth has also supported the right to information over more than two decades, starting with the 1980 Barbados Communiqué of its Law

---

<sup>30</sup> See 2003 Report of the Special Rapporteur for Freedom of Expression, p. 144, note 38. According to the Special Rapporteur's report, there is no record of any discussions on the inclusion of the word "seek."

<sup>31</sup> Id.

<sup>32</sup> Sir Dawda K. Jawara v. The Gambia, Decision of May 11, 2000, para. 65. Article 9 of the African Charter on Human and Peoples' Rights provides: "1. Every individual shall have the right to receive information. 2. Every individual shall have the right to express and disseminate his opinions within the law."

<sup>33</sup> Adopted at the 32nd Ordinary Session, October 17-23, 2002, Banjul, Gambia.

Ministers.<sup>34</sup> In 1999 the Commonwealth adopted a statement of Freedom of Information Principles, which encouraged its member countries to “regard freedom of information as a legal and enforceable right” and to establish “a presumption in favor of disclosure.”<sup>35</sup>

37. This overview of comparative and international law and practice shows that the right of access to official information has become widely accepted in the democratic world, including in the Americas, as a fundamental human right. Whether as part of traditional free expression guarantees or as a basic entitlement in its own right, it is perceived as an integral and imperative component of the broader right to democratic governance. Indeed, any arguments to the effect that the citizenry should not have a right to know what their government knows and does, subject only to compelling exceptions, smack of authoritarianism. As the three specialized mandates on freedom of expression have noted,

[i]mplicit in the freedom of expression is the public’s right to open access to information and to know what governments are doing on their behalf, without which truth would languish and people’s participation in government would remain fragmented.<sup>36</sup>

The Special Regime of the Right to Environmental Information

38. The information that was requested in this case from the Chilean authorities was related to the authorization of a foreign investment project with major environmental implications. It is therefore relevant to refer here to developments in international and comparative law in the special area of access to information on the environment.

39. Since the adoption of the United Nation’s Rio Declaration on Environment and Development (1992), access to environmental information has emerged as an essential component of sustainable development and public participation in environmental decision-making. Principle 10 of the Rio Declaration provides:

At the national level, each individual shall have appropriate access to information concerning the environment that is held by public authorities, including information

---

<sup>34</sup> The Communiqué expressed the view that “public participation in the democratic and governmental process was at its most meaningful when citizens had adequate access to official information.” Quoted in “Promoting Open Government: Commonwealth Principles and Guidelines on the Right to Know,” Background Paper for the Commonwealth Expert Group Meeting on the Right to Know and the Promotion of Democracy and Development (London: March 30-31, 1999).

<sup>35</sup> Adopted by the Commonwealth Law Ministers at their May 1999 Meeting, Trinidad and Tobago.

<sup>36</sup> Joint Declaration of the UN Special Rapporteur on Freedom of Opinion and Expression, the OAS Special Rapporteur on Freedom of Expression and the OSCE Representative on Freedom of the Media, November 26, 1999. See also the 2004 Joint Declaration of the three mechanisms, adopted on December 6, 2004, which affirms that “[t]he right to access information held by public authorities is a fundamental human right which should be given effect at the national level through comprehensive legislation....”

on hazardous materials and activities in their communities, and the opportunity to participate in decision-making processes.<sup>37</sup>

The public's right to know gains special importance in this area in view of the impact of environmental decision-making on the wellbeing and the most basic rights of large numbers of people.

40. Following up on the Rio commitments, the Member States of the United Nations Economic Commission for Europe and the European Union signed in Aarhus, Denmark, in 1998, the Convention on Access to Information, Public Participation in Decision-Making and Access to Justice in Environmental Matters.<sup>38</sup> Article 4 of the Convention requires all public authorities of the states parties to make environmental information available to the public, upon request, for which there is no need to provide a reason. In the Convention's definition, public authorities include all executive and other agencies "performing public administrative functions under administrative law."<sup>39</sup> "Environmental information" is also broadly defined to include not only technical information on the state of the environment, but also "activities or measures, including administrative measures, environmental agreements, policies, legislation, plans and programs, affecting or likely to affect the elements of the environment."<sup>40</sup>
41. The Rio and Aarhus processes have encouraged many countries to adopt legislation providing for a right of access to environmental information, sometimes before even recognizing a general right to information. To ensure compliance of its Member States with their obligations under the Aarhus Convention, the European Union has adopted a number of detailed directives requiring them to enact legislation implementing the right at issue.<sup>41</sup>

C. Chile Has Failed to "Give Effect" to the Right to Information

42. We have respectfully submitted that the victims have a right, under Article 13 of the Convention, to seek official information, to which right corresponds a positive obligation of the state to provide the requested information. Given the positive nature of this obligation, the right is usually guaranteed domestically through the adoption of laws or regulations that expressly require public authorities to provide information upon request. Such laws often determine in some detail the exceptional grounds on

---

<sup>37</sup> UN Doc. A/Conf.151/26 (vol. 1).

<sup>38</sup> UN Doc. ECE/CEP/43, adopted on June 25, 1998. The binding treaty, also known as the Aarhus Convention, entered into force on October 30, 2001. It has been ratified by thirty-three countries so far.

<sup>39</sup> Aarhus Convention, art. 2.2.

<sup>40</sup> Id., art. 2.3(b).

<sup>41</sup> See, in particular, Directive 2003/4/EC on Public Access to Environmental Information, January 28, 2003, which replaced an earlier directive on the matter (Council Directive 90/313/EEC).

which official information can be lawfully withheld (usually known as exemptions), the procedures for requesting and providing the information, and other practical aspects.

43. At the time of the victims' informational request to the Committee, Chile did not have a law (statute) or other infra-constitutional act of general application providing for a general right of access to state-held information. As a result of this lacuna, the requestors' appeals against the Committee's mute denial of access invoked the free expression provisions of the Chilean Constitution and the Convention.<sup>42</sup> However, their constitutional petitions were summarily rejected as manifestly unfounded by the Chilean courts—presumably as a result of a finding that there is no such right of access under the Chilean Constitution.
44. This state of affairs at the relevant time was in violation of Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention, read in conjunction with Article 13. Article 1 binds States Parties to “ensure to all persons subject to their jurisdiction the free and full exercise” of the Convention rights and freedoms. Article 2 complements this obligation by requiring States Parties to adopt “such legislative or other measures as may be necessary to give effect” to Convention rights and freedoms.
45. The Inter-American Court had an opportunity to expound upon the nature of these obligations in its Advisory Opinion on the Enforceability of the Right to Reply and Correction, where it argued that Article 2 “codifies a basic rule of international law that a State Party to a treaty has a legal duty to take whatever legislative or other steps as may be necessary to enable it to comply with its treaty obligations.”<sup>43</sup> Turning to the specific issue under deliberation, the Court concluded that,

[i]f for any reason ... the right of reply or correction could not be exercised by “anyone” who is subject to the jurisdiction of a State Party, a violation of the Convention would result which could be denounced to the organs of protection provided by the Convention.<sup>44</sup>

---

<sup>42</sup> The petitioners relied expressly on Article 19.12 and Article 5 of the Chilean Constitution, as well as Article 13 of the Convention. Constitutional Article 19.12 guarantees freedom of opinion and information, whereas Article 5 obliges all state bodies to respect and promote fundamental rights guaranteed by the Constitution and by international treaties ratified by Chile. These include the American Convention of Human Rights, which was ratified by Chile on August 21, 1990.

<sup>43</sup> Advisory Opinion OC-7/86, August 29, 1986, para. 30.

<sup>44</sup> Id., para. 28. The Court's opinion in this instance was requested by Costa Rica, which asked the Court, inter alia, whether it had an obligation under Article 2 of the Convention to adopt “the legislative or other measures that may be necessary to give effect to the right of reply or correction” guaranteed by Article 14 of the Convention. In response to this question, the Court concluded, affirmatively, that whenever the Convention right at issue “is not enforceable under the domestic law of a State Party”, that State is under an obligation to adopt “the legislative or other measures” referred to in Article 2 of the Convention. Id., para. 35 (emphasis added).

46. Likewise, in Chile, the right of access to government information, which we submit is guaranteed by Article 13 of the Convention, could not be freely and fully exercised at the time of the victims' request by virtue of that State's failure to adopt the necessary legislative and regulatory measures required to give effect to it. As a result of this failure—and as the victims' unsuccessful appeals to the domestic courts clearly demonstrate—the right of access was not enforceable under Chilean law. This amounted to a generalized violation of the informational rights of all Chileans and others persons under Chile's jurisdiction, above and beyond those suffered by the victims in the current case.
47. As noted above, in 1999 Chile adopted the Administrative Probity Act, which grants public access to “the administrative acts of the state administration bodies and the documents that support and complement them directly or essentially.”<sup>45</sup> This definition of the scope of the right of access is not only vague, but also seriously underinclusive. By tying the right of access to the technical category of the “administrative act”, the Act excludes a vast amount of records and other information in the possession of the state that do not constitute “administrative acts” or may not be directly related to final or contentious administrative decision-making.<sup>46</sup> The excluded records would encompass, for example, all sorts of research data collected by government agencies in the fulfillment of their day-to-day responsibilities that may not necessarily lead to any “formal administrative decisions.”
48. Article 2 of the Convention allows the States a certain choice of means in “giving effect” to the Convention rights, “in accordance with their constitutional processes and the provisions of [the] Convention.” The flawed definition of the 1999 Act is not, however, a matter of means of implementation, but of the essential content of the right to information. The Act's definition is based on the erroneous premise that access is allowed only to information expressly designated as public, rather than to all information that is not specifically exempted from disclosure in the interest of a compelling and clearly defined public necessity. In other words, the Act is effectively based on the premise of secrecy as the rule, with access as the exception. This would be analogous to accepting prior censorship as the rule, and free expression as the exception. As a result, in violation of Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention, Chile

---

<sup>45</sup> 1999 Act, Article 13.3. The phrase in the Spanish original is “los actos administrativos de los órganos de la Administración del Estado y los documentos que le sirven de sustento o complemento directo y esencial.” The 1999 Act is complemented by a 2003 law that seeks to clarify various aspects of the 1999 Act, including the definitions of “administrative act” and “administrative procedure:” Law No. 19.880 Establishing the Fundamentals of Administrative Proceedings That Govern the Acts of the State Administration [Ley que Establece las Bases de los Procedimientos Administrativos que Rigen los Actos de los Órganos de la Administración del Estado], published in the Official Journal of May 29, 2003.

<sup>46</sup> A 2001 implementing regulation defines administrative acts as “formal decisions issued by the organs of the administration, which contain final declarations of will [intent] made in the exercise of a public competency” (in original, “decisiones formales que emiten los órganos de la Administración, en las que se contienen declaraciones finales de voluntad, realizadas en el ejercicio de una potestad pública”). Supreme Decree No. 26 Establishing a Regulation on the Secrecy or Reservation of Acts and Documents of the State Administration, published in the Official Journal of May 7, 2001, art. 3.

continues not to comply with its obligation to ensure the “free and full exercise” of the Article 13 right to government information.

D. Chile’s Failure to Disclose the Information Requested by the Victims Violates Their Article 13 Rights

49. The almost complete denial by the Committee, an agency of the Chilean executive, of access to the specific information and records requested in this case, coupled with the summary dismissals of the victims’ appeals by the domestic courts, amounts to an infringement of their right to information. We will turn now to the issue whether such infringement was justified under Article 13. From a purely adjudicational perspective, Chile’s failure to comply with its “give effect” obligations under Article 2 would preclude, or at least render redundant, the review of its compliance with Article 13. We will nevertheless continue with a discussion under Article 13 because we believe that, even if Chile had given general effect to the right to information, it would still be in violation of the Article 13 principles on justified restrictions of the right to information.
50. Under paragraph 2 of Article 13, any restrictions on freedom of expression must be “expressly established by law to the extent necessary to ensure” one of the following enumerated aims:
- a. respect for the rights or reputations of others; or
  - b. the protection of national security, public order, or public health or morals.
51. The Inter-American Court has interpreted these provisions as imposing a four-part test for the legitimacy of restrictions, which must meet the following requirements:
- a. the existence of clearly established grounds for liability;
  - b. the express and precise definition of these grounds by law;
  - c. the legitimacy of the ends sought to be achieved;
  - d. a showing that these grounds of liability are “necessary to ensure” the aforementioned ends.<sup>47</sup>

With respect to the last, and often most important, of these requirements, the Court noted that proving the “necessity” of restrictions requires a showing of “compelling governmental interest ... that clearly outweigh[s] the social need for the full enjoyment” of Article 13 rights. The “just demands of a democratic society” must also guide, as an overarching value, the weighing of these competing considerations.<sup>48</sup>

---

<sup>47</sup> Compulsory Membership Opinion, para. 39. The Court reference to “grounds for liability” is taken from paragraph 2 of Article 13, which provides that the exercise of the right to freedom of thought and expression “shall not be subject to prior censorship but shall be subject to subsequent imposition of liability ...” Liability in this context is analogous to restrictions or exemptions to a positive right, such as the right to information, which imposes positive obligations on the state.

<sup>48</sup> Id., paras. 44-46.

Clearly established by law

52. As noted above, the requestors never received an official explanation from the Committee as to why their request was denied, and their judicial appeals were summarily dismissed by the domestic courts. The Chilean government claims that the denial of information was justified, but it fails to indicate on the basis of what domestic law—apart from a vague reference to “constitutional economic guarantees”<sup>49</sup>—even though it recognizes, unlike the domestic judiciary, that Article 13 of the Convention guarantees a right of access to information. Under these circumstances, we must conclude that the grounds for withholding the information in this case were neither expressly established, nor precisely defined by Chilean law. This is per se a violation of Article 13.
53. It is relevant to note here that the great majority of freedom of information laws in existence include relatively detailed provisions on the legal grounds for non-disclosure of information. These provisions, when well-drafted, enable individuals to predict with reasonable certainty the contours of their informational rights under the law—which is the very reason why the Convention requires that any restrictions to rights it guarantees be established by law.

Legitimate Aims

54. Chile appears to advance three main lines of defense under Article 13.2, arguing that the denial of information was justified in the interest of protecting (a) the confidentiality of the foreign investor’s commercial information; (b) the confidentiality of the Committee’s activities; and/or (c) Chile’s national economic interests.<sup>50</sup> The State has not indicated, however, to which parts or categories of the requested information each of these supposed justifications apply. This makes it difficult to determine whether these aims are legitimate under Article 13. A number of general observations can nevertheless be made.
55. It can be assumed that some of the information requested by the victims may have included confidential commercial information provided by Trillium. The withholding of this particular information would be justified, in principle, by the “rights of others” clause in Article 13.2.
56. The State’s second argument, on the other hand—that all categories of information denied to the requestors were “related to the characteristics of the Committee itself and its manner of exercising its private functions”<sup>51</sup>—is excessively vague and far-reaching. This argument seems to suggest that every document or information related to an agency’s fulfillment of its statutory responsibilities ought to be beyond the

---

<sup>49</sup> Admissibility Report, para. 39.

<sup>50</sup> Id., paras. 38-39.

<sup>51</sup> Id., para. 38.

public's reach. It is equally unclear what is meant by "private functions" of an executive agency. Such a rationale for exemptions is so broad that it is capable of excluding virtually all records held by government agencies, because in one way or another they are all related to some aspect of their administrative responsibilities. Accepting such an argument would negate the essential content of the right to information.

57. Many freedom of information laws and international instruments allow for an exemption aimed at protecting the confidentiality of internal government deliberations. This is done to ensure that officials can debate issues and share their opinions internally in a frank and honest fashion. The Council of Europe's 2002 Recommendation, for example, protects "the confidentiality of deliberations within or between public authorities during the internal preparation of a matter." This restriction is subject, however, to limitations in time and scope. For example, as is obvious from the text of the above declaration, the exemption applies only while a matter is under "internal preparation." Other countries exempt only opinions contained in internal government communications, but not factual information (see below). We submit that Chile's second argument invokes a legitimate aim only to this extent.

58. In this regard, withholding of information on internal deliberation grounds could only be justified, under Article 13.2 of the Convention, in the interest of "protection of ... public order." The Inter-American Court has noted that it is possible, within the framework of the Convention, to understand the meaning of public order as a reference to the conditions that assure the normal and harmonious functioning of institutions based on a coherent system of values and principles.<sup>52</sup>

While this may be a rather broad definition of public order, provided by the Court in the context of an advisory opinion, it might be understood to appropriately encompass in our case protection for the confidentiality of internal government deliberations as described above.

59. Chile's third argument, based on protection of national economic interests, is also sometimes considered a valid ground for withholding government information. The Council of Europe's 2002 Recommendation, for example, lists protection of "the economic, monetary and exchange rate policies of the state" among the exemption grounds. It is, however, completely unclear in what way the disclosure of the information requested by the victims—and what specific part of that information—would have harmed national economic policies.

60. In addition, the notion of state economic interests is potentially extremely broad. If this notion is not to be permitted to seriously undermine the right to access information, it must be interpreted in a clear and narrow manner. Direct and specific interests, such as protection of the national currency, are quite different from vague and generalized concerns, such as maintaining a positive climate for investment. This interpretation is consistent with the approach chosen by this Commission in its Declaration of Principles (see paragraph 63 below). For all these reasons, one must conclude that Chile has failed to minimally substantiate its claims under the “economic interest” heading.

---

<sup>52</sup> Compulsory Membership Opinion, para. 64.

Necessity and Proportionality

61. We turn now to the question of whether Chile’s denial of information in this case, in the supposed interest of protecting internal government deliberations and the commercial secrets of a third party, can be considered necessary and proportionate in a democratic society. As the Inter-American Court has repeatedly said in its analysis, referring also to the jurisprudence of the European Court of Human Rights, the “necessity” test of Article 13 is stricter than one based on “useful,” “reasonable” or “desirable” restrictions, and that it actually requires a showing of a “compelling governmental interest” in restricting the right at issue.<sup>53</sup>
62. Comparative freedom of information law and practice have developed a two-step analysis that should guide decisions regarding the necessity and proportionality of restrictions to the right of access. First, information can be withheld only if its disclosure is likely to cause significant harm to one of the legitimate aims specified by law. Secondly, the anticipated harm must be greater than the public interest in disclosing the information—in other words, if a careful balancing of the conflicting interests indicates that there is a prevailing public interest in disclosure, the information should be made public, despite any lesser harms it may cause.<sup>54</sup>
63. A similar, and indeed even stricter, approach has been adopted by this Commission in its Declaration of Principles on Freedom of Expression, which allows only for “exceptional limitations [to the right of access] that must be previously established by law in case of a real and imminent danger that threatens national security in democratic societies.” The harm and public interest principles have also been incorporated by the Aarhus Convention<sup>55</sup> and the Council of Europe’s 2002 Recommendation,<sup>56</sup> as well as many national freedom of information laws.
64. We submit that Chile’s justifications for its denial of information to the victims fail to meet this double test. First of all, the necessity of the restrictions should be examined

---

<sup>53</sup> Id., para. 46.

<sup>54</sup> For an analytical summary of comparative law and practice, see ARTICLE 19, The Public’s Right to Know: Principles of Freedom of Information Legislation, June 1999, available at: <http://www.article19.org/docimages/512.htm>.

<sup>55</sup> Article 3.4 of the Convention provides that a “request for environmental information may be refused if the disclosure would adversely effect” the enumerated state interests. In addition, the “grounds for refusal shall be interpreted in a restrictive way, taking into account the public interest served by disclosure ...”

<sup>56</sup> Under section IV.2 of the Recommendation, “[a]ccess to a document may be refused if the disclosure of the information contained in the official document would or would be likely to harm any of the [defined] interests, unless there is an overriding public interest in disclosure.”

by the authorities on a case-by-case basis, i.e. with respect to every document or piece of information requested. It is only by reviewing the nature and content of each specific document that the authorities can assess the harm that its disclosure might cause and the strengths of the public interest it would serve. The requirement of specific assessment of the potential harm is widely accepted as elementary. For example, in Kuijer v. Council, the Court of First Instance of the European Communities reviewed the European Council's refusal to provide a Dutch academic with documents regarding the asylum situation in a number of non-EU countries. The Court ruled in favor of the requestor, holding that the Council, which had claimed an "international relations" exemption, had failed to consider in any detail the practical effects that the disclosure would have on EU's relations with those third countries.<sup>57</sup>

65. In contrast, the circumstances of this case strongly suggest a wholesale refusal of information: the Committee never provided any reasons for its denial, and the government's generalized arguments make no reference to the various types of requested documents. For example, the Committee's formal and final decision giving Trillium the "go ahead" is treated no differently from any internal communications that may have led to that decision. This approach is inimical to the very notion of proportionality.
66. Another principle, closely related to case-by-case review, is that of partial disclosure, which applies to documents containing information that is confidential only in part. In such cases, the authorities must grant access to the non-exempted parts of the document, to the extent that those can be reasonably segregated.<sup>58</sup> This flows directly from the principle of minimal infringement of rights, which requires that, in choosing the means and methods for the "necessary" restriction of rights, governments have to adopt the least invasive alternative.<sup>59</sup>

---

<sup>57</sup> Case T-211/00 [2002] ECR II-Feb. 7. See also JT Corporation v. Commission, Case T-123/99 [2000] ECR II-3269, where the Court of First Instance found against the Commission for its failure, in part, to assess the potential harms from disclosure with respect to the contents of each requested document, rather than entire categories of documents. This was also essential for the Commission to be able to assess whether the requestor was entitled to partial access to each document. Para. 46.

<sup>58</sup> The Aarhus Convention guarantees partial access whenever the "information exempted from disclosure ... can be separated out without prejudice to [its] confidentiality" (art. 4.6). The Council of Europe's 2002 Recommendation provides:

If a limitation applies to some of the information in an official document, the public authority should nevertheless grant access to the remainder of the information it contains. Any omissions should be clearly indicated. However, if the partial version of the document is misleading or meaningless, such access may be refused.

In practice, partial access is usually granted by blanking out exempted information in paper documents or by leaving blank spaces in electronic documents.

<sup>59</sup> In the words of the Inter-American Court, a restriction is necessary only if "it cannot be reasonably achieved through a means less restrictive of a right protected by the Convention." Compulsory Membership Opinion, para. 79.

67. It is clear that the Committee did not consider partial disclosure in this case. For example, it is unimaginable that every piece of information held by the Committee regarding Trillium, whether provided by the company itself or another source, was genuinely a commercial secret. The same applies to internal communications of the Committee.
68. With respect to the latter issue, comparative law and practice draw two important distinctions. The first is temporal: internal discussions are often protected only while a decision on the matter is pending, and possibly for a short period thereafter. Once a final decision is made, and absent any other legitimate grounds for exemption, internal communications must be disclosed. This is clear, for example, from the text of the Council of Europe's 2002 Recommendation, which, as noted above, protects the confidentiality of government deliberations only "during the internal preparation of a matter."
69. The Court of First Instance of the European Communities established a similar precedent in British American Tobacco v. Commission, which involved a request for information on certain policy discussions within the Commission, including as to the position of the various member state delegations on the matter. The Court emphasized the fact that the request was made after the matter had been settled, and therefore the requestor's interest in disclosure was stronger than any interests the Commission might have in the confidentiality of its past deliberations.<sup>60</sup> The same reasoning would apply to the present case, given that the victims' request was made after the Committee had already given the go-ahead to the Condor River project.
70. The second important distinction made in this context has to do with substance: while opinions and other subjective judgments made by officials in the course of internal deliberations are generally considered confidential, raw data and factual information are not.<sup>61</sup> The rationale for this distinction is that disclosure of factual information in the possession of an agency does not, as a rule, affect the uninhibited and candid exchange of opinions among its staff.
71. For this same reason, national and international courts have adopted a differentiated treatment of facts and opinions even where the legislative texts are silent on that specific point. For example, the United States Freedom of Information Act (1966), one of the earliest freedom of information laws, exempts from disclosure "inter-agency or intra-agency memorandums or letters" which would not normally be available to third parties under common law.<sup>62</sup> Interpreting the scope of this exemption in EPA v. Mink, the U.S. Supreme Court distinguished between "materials

---

<sup>60</sup> Case T-111/00 [2001] ECR II-2997, paras. 56-57.

<sup>61</sup> See, inter alia, the Australian Freedom of Information Act (1982), sec. 36.5; the Canadian Access to Information Act (1983), sec. 21.1; and the Irish Freedom of Information Act (1997), sec. 20.2(b).

<sup>62</sup> 5 U.S.C. 552(b)(5).

reflecting deliberative or policy-making processes on the one hand, and purely factual, investigative matters on the other.” Information of the latter nature must be disclosed whenever it can be separated from the rest of the document without compromising deliberative confidentiality.<sup>63</sup>

72. The EC Court of First Instance reached a similar conclusion in the above-referenced JT Corporation case, which involved a request for copies of European Commission inspection reports and correspondence with a foreign government. The Commission refused access, arguing that its investigative activities relied largely on the cooperation and information-sharing of Member States and foreign governments, and their confidentiality expectations—a rationale similar to that of the confidentiality of internal deliberations. The Court ruled for the requestor, however, relying in part on a finding that much of the information at issue consisted of “descriptions and factual findings that clearly [did] no harm to inspection and investigation tasks.”<sup>64</sup>
73. The information requested in the present case was information produced and collected by the Committee in carrying out its “due diligence” and watchdog functions with respect to prospective foreign investors. While some of the documents at issue might contain opinion and value judgments made by Committee staff, they must have also included a significant amount of factual and objective information, such as on Trillium’s past compliance with Chilean legislation or its environmental track record in projects undertaken within or outside the country. Disclosure of that information would not have affected the Committee’s internal deliberations—which, in addition, had been concluded at the time of the request—and therefore would have caused no harm to any legitimate interests under Article 13.2.
74. In addition, and apart from the question of harm, the Chilean authorities failed to weigh the public interest in the disclosure of the requested information against any competing considerations. It is important to recall, in this context, that Terram’s request to the Committee came at a moment of intense public debate about the environmental sustainability of the Condor River project—an activity that had attracted unprecedented scrutiny and criticism from Chilean civil society. The Terram Foundation had been for years a leading contributor to that debate, which, at the time of the request, was focusing on the need for a more complete assessment of River Condor project’s environmental impact.
75. As already noted, public participation in environmental decision-making has become an essential part of sound environmental policies in the democratic world.<sup>65</sup> At the same time, there can be little meaningful participation in decision-making without access to information about processes and activities that affect the environment.

---

<sup>63</sup> 410 U.S. 73 (1973), at 89.

<sup>64</sup> Para. 47.

<sup>65</sup> See inter alia Principle 10 of the Rio Declaration; and the Preamble to the Aarhus Convention: “to be able to assert [the right to a healthy environment] and observe [the duty to protect it], citizens must have access to information [and] be entitled to participate in decision-making ... in environmental matters....”

Given what is at stake—including the basic human rights to life and health—denials of the right to environmental information can amount, as the Strasbourg Court has found in its Article 8 jurisprudence, to violations of international human rights law.

76. At the international level, the Aarhus Convention contains the most elaborate interpretation of the related principles of access and public participation in environmental matters. It is relevant here to refer to two provisions of the Convention, in particular. The first one imposes on the States Parties a general obligation to “[p]rovide in an appropriate form information on the performance of public functions ... relating to the environment by government at all levels.”<sup>66</sup> A more specific provision in Article 6—which deals with public participation in decision-making, including with respect to environmental impact assessments—provides:

Each Party shall require the competent public authorities to give the public concerned access for examination ... to all information relevant to the decision making [about proposed activities that may have a significant effect on the environment] that is available at the time of the public participation procedure.... The relevant information shall include ... the main reports and advice issued to the public authority....<sup>67</sup>

77. The information requested by the Terram Foundation would fall under the ambit of these provisions. Even though the Committee did not have, strictly speaking, any responsibilities on environmental matters, the information at its possession at the time was very relevant to the debate on Trillium’s environmental track record, and can therefore be equated with environmental information.<sup>68</sup> That information would have helped Terram and the public at large to assess Trillium’s integrity and the credibility of its on-paper commitments to sustainable development.

78. In view of the above, it is clear that the victims’ request was supported by a strong public interest in disclosure, which should have been weighed against any legitimate confidentiality interests—to the extent that any such interests existed with respect to some of the requested information, such as third-party commercial secrets or truly deliberative internal exchanges. By failing to take into account the public interest in disclosure, as the record suggests, the Chilean authorities fell once again short of the necessity and proportionality requirements of Article 13.

---

<sup>66</sup> Art. 5.7(c).

<sup>67</sup> Art. 6.6 (emphasis added). The Convention defines “the public concerned” as including “non-governmental organizations promoting environmental protection and meeting any requirements under national law.” Art. 2.5.

<sup>68</sup> As already noted, the Aarhus Convention has adopted a broad definition of environmental information, which includes any information on “activities or measures, including administrative measures, ... affecting or likely to affect the elements of the environment”, such as “soil, land, landscape and natural sites.” Art. 2.3.

III. Conclusion

79. We have respectfully submitted that the “freedom to seek, receive and impart information and ideas” guaranteed by Article 13 of the Convention, includes a general right of access to state-held information. We have further submitted that Chile has not complied with its Article 1 and 2 obligations to ensure the free and full exercise of that right within its jurisdiction, in part by virtue of its failure to give effect domestically to the right of access, through legislative or other appropriate means.

80. With respect to the facts of the present case, we submit that Chile has violated the victims’ rights under Article 13 in multiple respects. The denial of the requested information had no basis in law and, with respect to much of that information, did not serve any legitimate aim. Finally, it cannot be considered to be a necessary and proportionate restriction of the right to information.

Respectfully submitted,

For the Open Society Justice Initiative

James A. Goldston
Executive Director

Darian K. Pavli
Legal Officer

For ARTICLE 19

Toby Mendel
Law Programme Director

For Libertad de Información México, Asociación Civil

Issa Luna Pla
Vice-President

For Instituto Prensa y Sociedad

Javier Casas
Director, Access to Information Program